Monthly review

The markets ended April slightly up: +1.5% for the S&P500 and +1% for the Eurostoxx50. The S&P500 was driven by a few technology stocks (mainly the GAFAMs) and the Eurostoxx50 was supported by the luxury goods industry.

The month was marked by the release of Q1 2023 earnings.

The best performers in April were Microsoft (+6.6%), Air Liquide (+5.8%), S&P Global (+5.2%) and LVMH (+4.0%).

The portfolio's technology stocks (Microsoft, Amazon, Alphabet) published very good results despite the macroeconomic environment. These results reassured the markets. Microsoft reported a 7% increase in revenue, a 10% increase in operating income and a 9% increase in net income, well above analyst expectations. Its activities related to the cloud (up 16%) and artificial intelligence carried the group's growth despite the decline in PC sales.

Luxury goods leader LVMH reported an organic growth of 17% in the first quarter. The performance of the Fashion and Leather Goods division and the recovery in China drove this growth.

Other stocks in the portfolio also reported good results. This was the case for Air Liquide, which posted very solid revenue growth (+6.2% on a comparable basis). Moody's and S&P Global also published reassuring results given the slowdown in debt issuance activity. Both companies are well diversified and their data analysis segment (the "Analytics" division for Moody's and "Market Intelligence" for S&P Global) are growing robustly.

The worst performers were Sartorius Stedim (-14.0%), TSMC (-9.4%), ASML (-8.0%), Danaher (-6.0%) and Thermo Fisher (-3.7%).

The healthcare sector clearly underperformed in April. Sartorius Stedim reported sharply lower results (-15.3%) due to a normalization of post-Covid demand. Pharmaceutical companies Danaher and Thermo Fisher also suffered from lower Covid-related revenues. In particular, Thermo Fisher saw its operating margin fall to 21.8% (from 29.2% at the same time last year) but maintained its outlook for 2023. However, the valuation of these companies remains attractive given their quality. Danaher and Thermo Fisher are now trading at respectively 22 and 20 times next year's profits.

Semiconductor companies also underperformed in April. ASML stock fell on its earnings day despite reporting strong revenue growth and confirming its short-, medium-, and long-term outlook. The slowdown in net order intake disappointed the market. However, its backlog of 38.9 billion euros remains high and represents almost twice the 2022 revenue. As for TSMC, the company has no plans to cut its capital spending for 2023 despite a slight slowdown in semiconductor demand.

During the month, we reduced some positions that had recently performed well (LVMH, Microsoft, Lonza, among others) and slightly increased our position in Sartorius Stedim.
